Previous Research & Experience:

David's teaching interests are broadly focused on cultural politics and sociology/anthropology of the body in sport and leisure. He teaches across a range of modules that are the responsibility of the Sociology of Sport Group.

Before arriving at Loughborough in January 2006 David spent two years as Senior Lecturer in Sport and Leisure Cultures at the Chelsea School, University of Brighton and was Lecturer then Senior Lecturer in the Anthropology of Sport at the University of Gloucestershire from 1997-2003.

His research interests comprise two related strands, both of which are theoretically informed by social theories of embodiment, notably those developed by Bourdieu, Foucault and Merleau-Ponty. The first of these strands concerns the impaired sporting body, health and identity. This area of work is being developed through a life long involvement in, and commitment to, the Paralympic sporting movement. Long-term participant observation as athlete and administrator and latterly journalist and coach, has facilitated access to this rapidly changing sporting environment.

The second strand of David's research is concerned with the relationship between the sporting body, professionalism and medicine. Publication in 2004 of his first book entitled Sport, Professionalism and Pain: Ethnographies of Injury and Risk (Routledge) is the culmination of work in this area to date and more research and publications related to this theme are in the planning stages.
